

'BAHN BURNER: 200+MPH SYCLONE

Imagine you're running the German Autobahn at 170 mph in your Porsche, when suddenly your mirrors are filled with the upright, square black grille of a little American pickup truck. Do you: A) pull to the right and let him by; B) floor it and hope to outrun him; or C) never again have a Bratworst lunch before a ban-zai run. The answer is "A," because that's Dee's GMC Syclone and it's filled with the latest power parts from Kenne Bell.

According to Jim Bell, owner of Kenne Bell Performance Products, the story goes like this: "One day I get a call from Germany. Dee says his Syclone engine let go again on the Autobahn during a top-speed blast. Dee loves to race up and down the German autobahn. He would like to send us his truck for a 600hp bulletproof engine. We tell Dee that we don't work on customers' vehicles at Kenne Bell, but we could send all the parts to Jim Stokes in Michigan and Jim would build the engine."

After a trip around the world for horsepower, the truck now runs the quarter in the low 10s on stock tires and it's heading for the nines. And on the Autobahn, 5100 in overdrive calculates to over 200 mph. (5100 in third gear—1:1 ratio—would be 164 mph).

SMASH & DASH

If you're too old for the Streetstroller, then how about the Deluxe Power Potty Model from GEM Street Rod Products. This motorized TP hauler comes in your choice of custom frame colors with standard white gel-coat potty with a genuine solid oak seat, and the water closet is sealed so it makes a killer beverage cooler. Billet aluminum wheels wear big and littles, for just the right amount of rake. Power comes from a four-cycle, three-horsepower engine with recoil starter, and steering is done by the funny car-style batwing wheel. During testing, Potty engineers have found that the temptation to read while driving the Potty is too great, creating a visibility problem and a possible hazzard. Because friends don't let friends read, grunt and drive.

In the past, police of Troy, Michigan, have walked the beat, rode bikes, even donned Keystone Cops uniforms, but their latest gimmick has a Motor City spin to it. They've transformed a drug dealer's car, a 1931 Ford Coupe, into a police car complete with siren and flashing lightbar. Lt. William Tullock is shown with the car at Troy Police headquarters.

STREETSTROLLER

If your baby is already reading PHR cover to cover every month, and his first word was "Hiboy," then we've got the perfect carrying case for the little bugger: the custom-built 1932 Hiboy Streetstroller. The little rod has a handlaid fiberglass body with strong components that will support up to 200 pounds, just in case dad wants to go for a spin. It's available as a bare body, a complete kit, or finished to your specification. You pick the body color, the graphics and the interior material. Prices start at $170.
